Winterize your Irrigation System

Winter has officially started and many regions of Texas have already begun to experience colder temperatures. With shorter days and colder nights, many landscape plants like turfgrass have started to go dormant. Dormant plants require almost no supplemental irrigation since typical winter rainfall patterns are usually more than sufficient for any plant needs.

Most landscape irrigation systems should be turned off during the winter. This helps conserve water and can help protect the irrigation system from damaging winter conditions.

Additional winterization resources, including how-to videos are available at <https://irrigation.tamu.edu/winterization/>

Continue to monitor your weekly WaterMyYard [<https://watermyyard.org/#/Location>] notifications to determine when you will need to begin irrigating again.

Follow these simple steps to winterize your irrigation system:

- Turn off the irrigation controller,
- Turn off the irrigation system water supply near the water meter or backflow prevention assembly,
- Insulate any PVC pipes that are exposed above ground, and
- Drain the water from irrigation components installed above ground such as backflow prevention assemblies.
